Belgium's current regulations on utilization of GMOs in malt

Use of genetically modified organisms and their derivatives in food products is regulated by the European Union Regulation (EC) No 1829/2003 dated 22 September 2003. At present, only a limited number of GMOs is authorized for marketing, including several genetically modified varieties of rape, maize, cotton, and one variety of soyas. Consequently, no other genetically modified plant can be used in the food chain of the European Union at the moment. Moreover, no other genetically modified variety of a cereal can be grown for commercial purposes on the territory of the European Union at present.

In conclusion, production of malt from genetically modified barley is forbidden in the European Union. Besides, there is no sign indicating the presence of genetically modified barley on the global market.

Upon request, the Federation of the Belgian Maltsters may confirm this information.
